The choice of a technical school for the post-graduate study is a very important issue, and in this article the psychological issues which arise during this choice are considered. The studies carried out have demonstrated that the main aspects which must be taken into account for the choice of this type of study are: the feeling of being accepted or not, the feeling of being one of the others (lonely feeling, inadequacy), the feeling of being one of the principal ones, the feeling of having the support of the master, the desire of being one of the foreigners, the feeling of receiving in a technical school the attention which is felt to be necessary, the feeling of attention and participation in their future profession. The main difficulties found are related to the choice of the technical school which is more appropriate for the degree one year before the study, or to the choice of the study in the university which is closer to the home.Increased susceptibility to HIV infection and disease is a major unmet challenge in human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) therapy. The HIV-1 entry process represents a critical target in the development of such an anti-HIV therapy and is an attractive antiviral strategy because it represents an opportunity to block the virus at its first encounter with the host cell and represents a vulnerable point in the viral replication cycle that has not been effectively targeted with currently available drugs. Moreover, blocking HIV entry into the host cell also has the potential to impact the viral reservoir. We have discovered that the multi-step HIV-1 entry complex is targeted with the broadly neutralizing agents: PG1151, 2G12 and 4E10. These agents bind to HIV glycoproteins gp120 and gp41, blocking the engagement of coreceptors and entry into the target cell. Our broad objective is to develop and test small molecules that disrupt HIV-1 entry into host cells in vivo and provide a proof of principle for the concept of targeting entry with anti-HIV therapy. We hypothesize that small molecules that can effectively target and inhibit HIV-1 entry, especially those that can effectively cross cell membranes to inhibit the initial steps of the HIV-1 1cb139a0ed
