A "point and click" user interface for Windows. SSThingy's interface is clean and very intuitive. The main window of SSThingy displays a list of your applications (open windows). On the right side is a slider control for the application window width and another for the application window height. A large tabbed window is the main interface for configuring SSThingy's various settings. It allows the user to select the toolbars they want and customizes the mouse movements of the application windows. SSThingy allows for changing all the user preferences including toolbar placement, application window size, mouse movement, and screen saver settings. SSThingy has the ability to customize each window to the user's individual preferences. For example, the browser window can be set to minimize to the system tray. SSThingy's interface is very intuitive and easy to learn. SSThingy's advanced configuration window allows you to customize each application window's settings to suit your personal needs. Each daughter board is an electronic circuit board or module which plugs into the mother board, and is electrically connected to the mother board by conductors printed on a mother board surface. Because the density of the conductors is limited, the distances between the conductors are relatively large. In order to reduce the volume of space taken up by the circuit board, a computer is sometimes provided with a smaller daughter board, called a "zipper card". The zipper card includes a generally rectangular card body, and a plurality of terminals on a first side of the card body. A connector is mounted on a second side of the card body. The connector plugs into a connector on the mother board, and includes a number of spring contacts which engage the terminals on the zipper card. The spring contacts are located beneath a surface of the mother
